A listener once contacted me in response to my Smart Talk success post, how to accept a compliment with Grace. His question was a little different, but it was an important question. She wanted to know how to thank someone who has thanked you. Short answer? You don't. Many people have problems with this. Thanks for saying thank you! It's always Can walk. But at least in American culture, you don't give thanks; You accept. And there's a difference. If you receive a very good thank you note, it's especially hard to resist the temptation to thank that person back. So instead of being creative in your acknowledgement. When someone sends you thanks In the mail, this is a simple but important act of etiquette (although, unfortunately, it is rarely done anymore). You smile, and the next time you see the person, you can say, I got your beautiful note! I'm glad you liked

If anyone emailed a thank you for something you did for him, a simple, glad I could help! There is sufficient acknowledgement. If you receive a thank you and a gift card from an owner for a well-worked, again, accept the gift—perhaps with, I'm glad I was able to provide valuable input on the project. But it's an incentive, a reward for a job well done. Don't send thanks in return. SEE ALSO: Modern patrons promote how to self-promote at work without feeling lcky If you receive a very good thank you note, it's especially hard to resist the temptation to thank that person back. So instead of being creative in your acknowledgement. Recently I had guests stay in my house for two nights. They were a family of five whom I had never met before. I met husband once 20 years ago, because she is the cousin of my late husband. Anyway, a few weeks after their visit, they sent me a wonderful, handmade thank you card. The image of the front was really good-a signed painting by his youngest son (10 years). I decided to keep the picture, so I just cut it into painting. I then put the painting on my gallery; I keep a string with clips on the wall in my office for pictures that I like or photos that attract my kids. I took a picture of the image on the gallery and sent the picture as a text message to people that the family sent that note. It wasn't for a thank you. It was an acknowledgement that I appreciated the extra effort of handmade thanks thanks. So the bottom line is this: accept a thank you. Mention that you received it, especially if thanks you went above and beyond. But there is no need to send thanks in response to thanksgiving.
